

It is hard to express what is not meant to be defined. I am most inspired by love and spite. Each piece starts as a hum in the back of my throat growing louder until I can't constrain it. Then I make something and put it here.

Inspired by Plato's Analogy of this cave, this piece comments on our inability to see. We may sometimes have a glimpse into the way things are or why they are that way but our grasp is limited and irrational. Our understanding of the present is molded by what we have learned in the past. We never experience anything without any prior existence. Our experience of reality is merely a perception. Until we understand that, we are trapped in the cycles and patterns of our reactions.

To break away from this, you must understand your oneness with this world. You are not individual, the world is not your other. We are collective, connected, whatever you want to call it, we are one.

I loveeee sprinkles. They are so colorful and fun to look at. They can make anything look better. If you mess up a cake or the cookies you made are a bit burnt, just add some sprinkles. It won't help too much with the flavor or anything but at least it will look nice. Anyways, it's not like I was going to marry the sprinkles or anything. They're just for fun.

In case that was a bit too cryptic, modern women have been lobotomized by extreme expectations of beauty. Conscious of it or not, they will in some way or another base their worth at least partially on their appearance. Self objectification and sexualization prompts the same treatment from others.

The more time a woman spends obsessing over her appearance, the less time she has with herself, to create, and to love. The more importance allocated to a woman's beauty, the less attention paid to other qualities of her identity.

No Brainer

Are you thinking with your dick for biological, evolutionary, or societal reasons?

What do we do in the inevitable case that it's actually a fun mix of all three?

While we figure this out, do you mind not looking at my boobs, please?

Do You Really?

As women, our bodies will never be left alone. An attractive body will be lusted after, left sexualized and inanimate while an unattractive body is scrutinized and shamed. The catch, however, is that standards of beauty are neither stagnant nor unanimous. A woman can be simultaneously praised and shamed for the body she has despite never bringing attention to it herself.

The obsession with women's bodies prompts inherent objectification and women's lack of autonomy. Emphasized importance of women's physical appearances diminishes the perceived value or all other aspects of their identities. Violence and sexual violence towards women is driven by societies that do not view them as fully human.

Pour cette œuvre, j'ai dû prendre des centaines de photos de la Martinique, les découper et les recoller afin de représenter une mulâtresse, une femme typique de la Martinique. J'ai été inspirée par la poterie de Sylvain Fillon. Beaucoup des poteries qu'il crée rendent hommage à la Martinique et à la culture martiniquaise.

Elle porte un foulard en tissu madras, qui a été introduit en Martinique lorsque les colons ont ramené des Indiens pour faire le travail que les esclaves nouvellement libérés ne voulaient plus faire. À ses oreilles, elle porte des boucles d'oreilles créoles, que toutes les filles rêvent de porter quand elles seront plus grandes.

On oublie souvent notre histoire et on n'apprécie pas assez notre culture à cause de cela. Petite, on se moquait de moi parce que j'étais martiniquaise, en disant qu'on n'était pas des gens civilisés, qu'on venait d'un pays pauvre ou qu'on avait un accent drôle. Aujourd'hui, je ne pourrais pas être plus fière de mon pays.

Through suffering, we cause suffering.

We must learn to transform our suffering into love to heal ourselves and others.

To do so, one must have grace.
